COMINGS AND GOINGS: KENTUCKY'S IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION HISTORY

Kentucky's immigrant experience began with the first settlers to the commonwealth in the mid-1700s. This discussion explores the diversity of Kentucky's immigrant population, describes opportunities for researchers to understand their ancestor's immigration and emigration travels, and provides reasons for understanding historical context to facilitate research.

IMPORTANCE OF IMMIGRATION RESEARCH

- Provides opportunities for researchers to understand their ancestor's motives for migrating to and from Kentucky
- Gives insight into cultural, economic, political, and religious factors at play during the 18th and 19th centuries that influenced migration / immigration to and from Kentucky
- Illustrates the diversity of immigrant experiences in Kentucky

POINTS TO CONSIDER

- Where did our ancestors start out from. Why did they leave to come to Kentucky?
- Immigration is never easy. What kinds of hardships did our ancestors endure?
- Why did they settle where they stopped? How long did they stay in one place?
- What affect did settlement vs. displacement issues have?
- There were periods of intolerance where immigrants were not accepted. How did this affect Kentucky?
- What kinds of opportunities attracted immigrants to Kentucky? Were they seeking land, leaving unrest at home, looking for new jobs or education?
- How did Kentucky try to directly affect immigration?
- What caused out-migration from Kentucky? Who left and why?
- What records are available to assist in the research?

SOME STATE PUBLICATIONS ON IMMIGRATION, A CHRONOLOGY

- 1790-1850 Tabular statement regarding progress of population in Kentucky
- 1809 Governor's message regarding treaty with Chickasaws
- 1817 Governor's message concerning the difficulties in regaining slaves who had escaped to Ohio and Indiana

1886 Senate Journal report on appropriations for the Bureau of Immigration and monies to aid the exhibits at the Expositions in New Orleans and Louisville

1896 Governor's message on worthless and dangerous immigration to U.S.

MIGRATION PATTERNS

- Migration has been primarily responsible for the distribution of the state's residents.
- Most migrants came overland by way of the Wilderness Road, but increasing numbers traveled down the Ohio River
- After 1820, when the Kentucky population exceeded half a million, the growth rate dropped well below that of the nation, indicating a loss of residents to other states
- In 1860 Virginia was the origin of most migrants to Kentucky, followed in order by Tennessee, Ohio, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania
- By 1870 most migrants to Kentucky came from Tennessee. By 1970 most came from Ohio
- Migrants from Indiana, Illinois, and West Virginia came to Kentucky in greater numbers during the twentieth century, while the numbers from North Carolina and Pennsylvania declined
- The movements of Kentucky natives to other states show a significant shift from a movement west in the nineteenth century to a movement north by the mid-twentieth century
- In 1850 Missouri, followed by Texas, was the leading destination of Kentucky migrants and remained so until 1910

Kentucky Historical Society

- Economic factors have exerted the greatest influence on the movements of people both into and out of Kentucky. Within sixty years after the first settlers moved in, the availability of good farmland farther west caused a net loss in population
- The failure of Kentucky to develop major manufacturing industries to supplement agriculture and mining made it even more difficult for the state to retain its population in the years following World War II
- Compared with more urbanized states of the region, Kentucky has attracted relatively few foreign immigrants
- In 1850 the first count of the foreign-born tallied 31,400 immigrants, or 4 percent of the state's population. The highest percentage (6.4) of foreign-born persons in Kentucky was recorded in 1869 and the greatest number (63,400) in 1870
- From 1860 until 1950 both numbers and percentages of the foreign-born decreased
- Since 1950 there has been a slight increase

EXAMPLE OF HISTORICAL CONTEXT FROM ABROAD

Scotland:

- Push of poverty, crop failures, cattle blight, & unemployment. Pull of opportunity.
- 1690s, 1709, 1740 & 1760 were disastrous agriculture years for Scotland's mainstay crop of grey oats
- Colony immigration to NY, Carolinas, New Jersey, Connecticut, Georgia, & Vermont (et al.) in 1600s & early 1700s were both forced (mostly Highlanders) and unforced (mostly Lowlanders)
- 1707, Act of Union (unification of Scottish and English Parliaments) allowed emigration without penalty. Continued until 1775 when Parliament decided emigration was detrimental to Scotland's economy
- 1715 -1745 Jacobite uprisings
- 1762, the beginning of the "clearances" or "improvements"
- Halted during American Revolution only to resume in 1782
- After 1784, most Scottish emigration went to Canada
- Emigration slowed by 1840, and by 1890 the Highlands were so depopulated that immigrants from that locale almost totally stopped

Ulster:

- Push of poverty, crop failures, religious strife, & unemployment. Pull of opportunity.
- 1729 British Commission concluded that Ulstermen were leaving because:
 - Drastic rise in the price of corn
 - Similar drastic drop in the price of linens
 - Rise in rents and a push by clergy for payment of tithes
 - But, did not discourage immigration because the immigrants could help combat the French and Indian "problem" in the New World
- According to 1790 census, 14% of Virginians were Scots-Irish
- By end of the War of 1812, approximately 350,000 Scots-Irish emigrated to North America
- 1840s potato famine contributed to second wave of emigration
